That's the same principle running through everything we build today: sales, support, operations, and security, on one connected system — not five separate logins. We're still early in that build. But the direction is set: every new platform we ship plugs into the same ecosystem, so your team spends its time running the business, not stitching tools together.

A job stalls or slows — and the cause could be the GPU, the fabric, the storage, or the workload, while every layer looks healthy on its own dashboard. Caladrius finds what breaks, and fixes it. When a job stalls, it traces the problem below the application layer — across device, fabric, storage, and workload — and names the root cause. Then it closes the loop: driving the fix on your approval, and verifying it held. Fewer stalled runs. Root cause in minutes, not an afternoon. More useful work from the most expensive asset you own.

Yanvi is building a standalone AI computer with an expressive body - a desk robot that brings intelligence into the room, not just onto a screen. It listens, thinks and acts through voice, while its eyes, light and motion make its activity visible as it happens. Yanvi runs local models offline, connects to cloud models with your own keys, or works with your computer through a direct, permissioned connection. With no onboard camera, a hardware microphone mute and no required subscription, Yanvi is designed to be present in everyday work. Engineered in Canada and preparing to manufacture in India, Yanvi is pre-launch and will make its institutional debut at Bengaluru Tech Summit 2026.
